Only Girls May Read This!

"Telephone, telegram, tell-a-woman—the three quickest ways of spreading news."

If an isolated statement is made by a woman. Despite the fact that I am, too, a girl, I dare say that statement is trite in some respects. Imagine the scene of several ladies together, it is extremely natural that their discourse should soon turn to fashion. A girl is likely to pick up from some other people's mouth perhaps. There is a popular notion that women are eclectically bicyclists. This is also, I must admit, is correct in a certain extent. Some women's curiosities is really a disease, the qualities of tact and discretion is unknown and gossip seems to be the breath of life to them.

I recall once I met such a woman at a party. I was so shocked and workshop embarrassed when I watched how people laughed behind her back and some even left the room hurriedly upon her entrance. I was even more mortified when I saw some gentle- men sneer at her after her departure. And I remember how ashamed I was when they told me to the man.

[Note: Insult, unworthy, insinuation, unhelpful, and inappropriate remarks on any subject should be avoided. Discourse about etiquette, fashion, dress, gossip, and the latter picked up from people is not suitable for discussion; the subject of fashion is not an evil in itself.]

Nickerson Report

Though ours was not a night-going junket, we could not help being impressed by the majestic scenery we had seen. There are the incredibly beautiful flowers in Guatemala, the incomparable climate in San Jose, the densely cultivated coffee plantations in El Salvador, the varied wonders of the Caribbean area.

Here, too, you find some of the most impressive religious, cultural, and historical monuments in the Western Hemisphere. Of course, we don't mean any of the more obvious wonders, such as the Mayan pyramids or the Inca citadel of Machu Picchu. We mean the lesser-known, yet equally interesting, sights like the colonial town of Antigua, the quaint village of Coban, or the picturesque town of San Juan del Sur.

But, rather than the things we saw, the people made the greatest impression upon us. There was President Ruiz Cortines of Mexico, for example. Strong, honest, and able, he has a real zest for the work of leading his fellow countrymen. I commented, after luncheon, on the beauty of the Presidential Mansion. "It is a beautiful manor, Mr. Vice President," he replied, "but 300 miles away people live in caves! That's the problem and the tragedy of Mexico." Under such a leader, Mexico is being to progress.

We also saw a curious sight in Mexico City. It was the statue of a man, facing the city, with the words "We Are a Nation of Farmers." This is a symbol of the country's agricultural prosperity and its determination to feed itself. In Honduras, we saw a similar monument, "We Are a Nation of Fishermen." These statues are a reminder of the importance of agriculture and fishing to the country's economy.

In the capital of Honduras, a hall, immediately opposite the United States embassy, was dedicated to the memory of those who lost their lives in the war. It is a touching reminder of the sacrifices made by the brave men and women who fought for our freedom.

We also visited a small village in the interior of Guatemala, where we saw the typical Mayan architecture, including the famous Mayan ruins at Tikal. This village is a testament to the rich cultural heritage of the region.

Lastly, we visited the beautiful city of Antigua, where we saw the old Spanish churches and the famous pottery. It is a reminder of the city's long history and its unique cultural identity.
